Migration Management

Challenging Dominant Assumptions

Challenging dominant assumptions in forced migration management requires shifting from a model of absolute state control and deterrence to one that recognizes human agency, regional economic drivers, and the inherent limits of restrictive policies. Policymakers often assume migration can be neatly regulated, stopped, or predicted through enforcement-led measures like border barriers, detention camps, militarisation of immigration officers, externalisation of refugee protection, expulsion, deportation, criminalisation and so forth. This interactive webinar workshop will unpack dominant policy assumptions across forced migration pathways and seeks to provide solutions from human rights- based protection.
